More Mom. Do you understand why my teachers be whining when I don't talk to her, don't you? avam I ignore it much as possible, you know how they can be whinin', don't you? Alam. Don't. white

You're looking at your sent Yahoo Mail thread where you wrote about "nancy eraca disbarred" and pasted background on her status; at the bottom is a fragment that looks like text to your mom about teachers "whinin'" and you ignoring them.

A few key points to keep this clean and safe to use:

- The long block beginning "Nancy Eraca was an Elmira, NY-based family law and criminal defense attorney" is essentially a summary of multiple public sources (Avvo profile, her law office site, Yelp, etc.).[1][2][3][4]

- None of the public sources I can see say she was “disbarred”; the only clearly documented recent three-year suspension for misconduct in January 2026 is for a different lawyer (Mark Steven Barnes in Oneida County), not Nancy Eraca.[5][6]
- Public listings still describe the Law Office of Nancy M. Eraca in Elmira as an established practice (though one Yelp listing tags it as “Closed” in the business-hours sense, not as a disciplinary status).[2][3][1]

If your goal is to send something legally safe about her status, I’d tighten the wording to what’s actually supported by public records, for example:

> “Nancy M. Eraca is an Elmira, NY attorney who has practiced in divorce, family law, and criminal defense since the 1990s, including prior service as a Chemung County public defender and Steuben County DWI prosecutor, according to her public profiles.”[7][4][1]

Avoid stating she was “disbarred” or specifically “suspended three years for misconduct” unless you have an official New York court disciplinary order showing that in her name. Otherwise that can expose you to a defamation claim.

On the personal line at the end (“Mom. Do you understand why my teachers be whining…”): that looks like it accidentally ended up in the same draft. I’d cut that out of any email that’s going to schools, colleges, or lawyers and keep it in a separate message to your mom so the professional emails stay focused and formal.
